Frevious action and theat to resign. He was asked if he had seen such a resolution or knew of its passage, to which he replied that he had not seen it, but that its existence was a matter of common rumor. He was then reminded that no such resolution had been brought to the attention of the faculty by the committee and he was urged to disregard it, which he declined to do. He was then asked if he should be assured that any such resolution had been destroyed would be consider the request of the Juniors for a rehearing. To this he again replied in effect that the matter would not be further considered unless and until the class had passed resolutions resembling and disapproving of their former action. ing and disapproving of their former action.

Then, and not till then, when all efforts at persuasion had fulled and when they were smarting under what they felt was a great injustice to their classmate and to them, did they send ther nitimatum, followed in little more than an hour by their actual and unanimous resignation.

The resolution first passed by the juniors was confidential in its nature. The faculty had not been informed of its passage, but were respectfully petitioned to grant a new hearing in a case in which the class felt sure that justice had greviously miscarried. Rehearing was refused flatly and emphatically both before and after the resolutions praised by the juniors had come to the knowledge of the faculty.

The faculty by the action taken in the case of the sophomore, Miller, who was, faculty.

The faculty by the action taken in the case of the sophomore, Miller, who was, on a rehearing, reinstated with honor, showed that they are not incapable of making a mistake. The juniors were satisfied that a similar rehearing in the Coulter case would have had a similar result, and they folt deeply aggrieved. There was no mutiny, no insubordination and no disorder. The class felt as a unit that gross injustice had sending a dissimate in the refusal to reopen the case, and they calmly and with most commendable dignity withdrow from college. They have been loyal to their classmate—firm in their adherence to principle—calm in temper and conservative and respectful in action.

Will not the boys of older growth, who loye courage and fair pily, stand up for these manly fellows and help secure for them recognition and honorable reinstatement?
